This filing consists of an email titled “Behind the Merger: An Integration Update from Adam Schechter” sent to Merck & Co., Inc. (“Merck”) employees from Adam Schechter, Merck Integration Lead, on June 30, 2009, in connection with the proposed transaction between Merck and Schering-Plough Corporation.

Behind the Merger: An Integration Update from Adam Schechter

Dear Colleagues,

How do you successfully bring together two strong healthcare companies to create a new leader in global healthcare?

You begin by planning for it – and then executing on the plans.

Part of our Day 1 planning includes hitting certain regulatory milestones. In late May, we told you about the filing of the merger proxy (the "S-4"). On June 16, Merck and Schering-Plough filed an amended proxy and announced the date for the Special Shareholder Meetings where shareholders will have the opportunity to voice their opinion on the proposed merger. And last week we heard from the U.S. Federal Trade Commission about our merger filing, as well as formally priced a $4.25 billion debt offering in support of the merger. (Articles about these milestones are on the Integration News Site.) In short, things are moving along as planned.

Now I want to talk to you about three key steps in building the new Merck:

1. Getting ready for Day 1
2. Designing the New Merck organization
3. Building a new culture

Day 1 Readiness

On June 19, we held a meeting with more than 100 colleagues from Merck and Schering-Plough to focus exclusively on Day 1 readiness. The goal was to make sure we can begin operating as one company on Day 1 as smoothly as possible – for our customers and external stakeholders, and with you as colleagues.

Colleagues from Merck and Schering-Plough's major sites and regions were key participants in the meeting, providing their input on what is really critical to achieve on Day 1. Here are some of the "must-haves":

- o Business continuity plans for every division and function
- o Planning for legal entity consolidation in key countries
- o Guidance on meeting regulatory and financial obligations seamlessly
- o Customer communications to proactively touch the people who depend on us
- o "Grants of authority" which make it clear who can authorize company transactions

Why go into such a level of detail? Because combining two companies such as Merck and Schering-Plough is a big and complex undertaking. We want to do everything we can to preserve and grow value and to enhance the strength of our combined R&D pipeline.

Designing the New Merck Organization

Another important step in planning for the new company is designing an organizational structure—starting at the top—that supports the advancement of our pipeline and the successful management of our business on a much bigger scale than either company operates on today.

A lot of progress has already been realized in this effort, from meetings that Merck Executive Committee (EC) members are having with Schering-Plough colleagues in large and small group sessions around the world, to the development of targeted strategies to keep and build the value of the new company and its talented people. To make the new Merck a success, we must have solid insight into colleagues at both companies. We are also following a well defined process to design the overall structure of the new Merck, as well as the structures of its divisions and functions. Underpinning the design work are 5 core principles:

- o Clear accountability for business performance
- o Innovation that drives long-term growth

- o Focus on creating value for our customers
- o Flexibility to support business evolution
- o The engagement, retention and attraction of top talent

With these principles in mind, Dick Clark has begun building the structure for the new Merck, including its EC. As he advances through this work, he has also asked current Merck EC members to think about what the next level of the organization could look like. Dick is using this input, input from members of Schering-Plough's Executive Management Team, and models from customer-focused, innovation-driven companies to arrive at a design for Merck's senior-most structure.

Once he finalizes the overall company structure, including EC design, Dick will select the members of his new leadership team. In turn, this team will begin to define the next layer of the organization including management roles (known as EC+1) and the people who will fill them. The selection process will incorporate the knowledge gained through the meetings with Schering-Plough leaders, knowledge of both organizations' current structure, capabilities and talent, and best practice models from inside and outside our industry.

In the end, I realize that most employees want to know the outcome of all this work. In other words, what is the new Merck structure and who will be on the new Merck leadership team. We expect to share our new structure and senior leaders (EC+1) by late August. The structure of the entire organization will take time to develop and will be led by each division, function and country at the appropriate pace. This work will continue into the period post-closing.

Building the New Culture

The new Merck will have core cultural aspirations - improving global health, acting with ethics and integrity, building customer trust and value, and supporting science and innovation. In addition, we've been focusing on three specific attributes that will help make the combined company successful. They are Customer Focus, Courage and Candor, and Rapid, Disciplined Decision Making.

The IMO Team working on Culture is designing detailed plans to guide leadership, and ultimately all employees in how to 'live' the new culture. The team is in the midst of a three-step action plan focused on gathering information from both Merck and Schering-Plough through:

- o Global Culture Focus Groups – bringing together regional, divisional and functional colleagues from both companies for interviews and discussions
- o Senior Leader interviews – talking to global leaders about their experiences to better understand how we can positively drive culture and identify areas of tension in our organizations
- o Global Culture Expert Forum – highlighting best practices in culture change from both companies and building them into our Day 1 and post Day 1 approach

Integration Information and Answers

As always, I encourage you to read The Daily and continue sending your questions and comments to the Integration Team. While the team cannot answer each question individually, we will certainly keep your ideas and inquiries an important consideration in our work.

In the meantime, I continue to be excited about the future of our combined company -- and I believe that together colleagues from both companies will create a new leader in global healthcare.

Sincerely,

Adam Schechter

Merck Integration Lead
