The following is a transcript of a portion of a video of Rob Marcus, Chairman and Chief Executive Officer of Time Warner Cable Inc., speaking about his recent visit to employees in Austin, posted on Time Warner Cable Inc.'s internal employee website on April 15, 2014.

I think it's always important for us to have an opportunity both to have senior management articulate what's going on in our world to our employees, because all the action's actually happening where our employees are, but it's equally important for us to get an opportunity to get feedback from people who are touching customers on a day-to-day basis. And emails and videos and webcasts and whatnot are helpful vehicles but there's nothing that actually is equal in terms of power to actually seeing people in person.

Especially at times like these where you have so much in our world that's changing, obviously the biggest of those things being the announced merger with Comcast, but equally importantly I'm here in Austin and we know we have a new competitor in the form of Google breathing down our neck. And having an opportunity to have our team hear from me that everything's going to be OK, because truly it is, I think matters.

We're taking the right steps. The fact that we've renewed our emphasis on putting the customer at the center of everything we do is appreciated. I talked with a bunch of customer satisfaction reps, which I think is one of the most fabulous programs we've instituted to improve the overall customer experience, and both they get it but they think our customers get it. They understand that it's a different Time Warner Cable.

I like to think of this combination as an opportunity to take the best of the two companies. And I believe Comcast shares that commitment. So the idea that we, for example, just on the product side, could take our TWC TV App, which I think is absolutely the best in the business, given the number of linear channels that we include in that, and combine that in some way shape or form with the Comcast X1 user interface, which is state of the art and highly regarded – there's something in there that could unlock an even greater set of products and experiences for our customers. One of the reasons I feel as confident as I do about the potential for this combination between Time Warner Cable and Comcast is that we really share a common set of values. And putting the customer at the forefront of our thought processes and decision-making is something that we both actually believe in strongly. I think it's got the potential to really be a catalyst for a whole lot of great change with the two companies coming together.
